Life was hard and child mortality high. Josiah was nearly twelve when he awoke one day giddy and much disordered covered with an excessive number of spots. It was a virulent attack of smallpox and he was lucky to survive it, but it left him with a severe infection in the right knee. This returned as he grew older, hampering his progress greatly. With an emerging tenacity and strength of will he persevered, finally completing his apprenticeship in 1749, only to receive a further blow. His brother Thomas refused to accept him as a partner.

Partnership with Thomas Whieldon

Josiah, never long daunted, went into partnership with Thomas Alders and John Harrison, a local tradesman and the son of a banker, who had acquired an interest in a pottery works. Two years later, in 1754, he entered into a partnership with Thomas Whieldon of Fenton, a potter of high repute and with a good business. The two men had a similar outlook with strong inclinations towards experiment and improvement, and Josiah was free to carry out various researches. Excavations at Fenton Vivian have since revealed many examples
